

Reflection:

Drupal, the thing of wonders and of nightmares. I was often surprised at the capabilities this CMS had and how much could be configured.

I knew Drupal was going to be a challenge, everyone warned me and told me so. But sadly enough this did not stop me so I decided to go for Drupal instead of Wordpress which is easier, better supported and documented.

Now I had poured in too much effort to give up so I decided I was going to stick with my decision. And sometimes I was happy with this decision but other times very much not.

I had to look up a lot of things and many of the times I started looking I never found an answer to my question, so I just had to try myself. This way I learned a lot and sometimes even tweaked in the php files of drupal which was fun. Now the less fun thing was that for something small I had to look a lot up and it took ages for stuff to get done. Although I am happy with the result even if it's very spartan and basic because I knew how hard it was to get working.

But even after all this I am probably never using Drupal again. This is something you really need to understand and know a lot of to be effective using it. I had to look up way too much and mostly found nothing. But in the 2 months of dabbling in Drupal I understand the appeal and see the power that Drupal has.

Thank you for reading,

Jesse Vandekerckhove.